Change the color, brightness, and contrast to make your own unique video. You will also be able to add or remove files, create your own custom effects, convert files, play video clips, add subtitles and more. Easily create professional quality videos and filmstrips." On the blog of Ableton, published by the creator of the software, Max, it says: "Max is still working on adding some features, as well as adding a plug-in manager. Max and the C++ source are the best way for me to go. The reason is that it gives me the flexibility of being able to have two different versions of the program (the one provided and the Max version)." A poster at Google Translation has pointed out that if you look at the URL of the page, it goes "to a page on the Google site that has been de-indexed in the US." This includes a Google Webmaster Tools site, which when you click on it, displays the following message: "Your site has been removed from our index." The poster also says that "I suspect it has something to do with Max being copyrighted by Apple and used with Apple products. I tried to search for Max, the software, and Apple Inc., but it seems that all of the hits are for the 'Max for Live' product, which is a different piece of software. Another poster on Reddit, who was in a meeting at the time of the de-indexing, says that "It was an error. The page was updated by Google's webmaster team." Read a blog about how you can use ColorStation's award-winning Digital Color Management Suite to achieve the perfect match of color for different types of production. The blog includes how to set up cameras for different types of production and how to work with existing clips. It also includes an explanation of how to apply a custom Color Space to a project.
